FMI: Nonresidential construction index decreases in Q3

By Habibur Rahman on August 26, 2014

Raleigh-based FMI, which provides management consulting and investment banking to the engineering and construction industry, recently released the 2014 Third Quarter Nonresidential Construction Index report.

The report shows a decrease of 3.3 points from the second quarter, but is still above the same time period in 2013. The cost of materials and labor continues to climb weighing negatively on the index.

Other factors keeping the NRCI from rising are government entities continuing to reduce spending and avoid making final decisions on the highway bills, as well as private investors taking a passive role waiting for others to act first.

FMI said in a statement that the economy has passed the “survival” stage and currently occupies the “thriving” phase. Backlogs remain strong with expectations of improvement and productivity up slightly. Thriving in the new economic climate will require companies to not just be the strongest or biggest, but also the most adept at dealing with change.

Fuelsnews – Today’s Market Trend September 29, 2014

Violence continues in Eastern Ukraine despite another ceasefire signed last week. Concerns now turn to the nation’s natural gas security as winter approaches. Ukraine’s government will need to repay $3.1 billion in debts to Russia before they receive any guarantee of supply. European leaders are concerned a disruption in Ukrainian supplies could threaten those of European nations, as well.

The CFTC reported a 47-percent increase in commercial long positions last week and October gasoline futures currently trade at nearly a 20-cent premium to November futures, illustrating the impact of recent refinery outages which resulted in short supply.

WTI crude futures are up 8 cents a barrel this morning at $93.62. Diesel futures remain relatively flat at $2.7021 a gallon and gasoline futures continue to rise ahead of the October future’s expiration tomorrow, adding just over 3.5 cents a gallon at $2.6985.
